WITH BUSKY-HAUGHTY LIPS, O SEA!

BY WALT WHITMAN.

With husky-haughty lips, O Sea!

When day and night I wend thy surf-belt shores,

Imagining to my sense thy varied strange suggestions,

Thy troops of white-manned racers racing to the goal,

Thy ample, smiling face, dashed with the sparkling dimples of the sun,

Thy brooding soul and mirth, thy unloosed hurricanes,

Thy manhood, earnest, capricious, wilfulness,

Greatness that above the rest, thy many tides —a lack from all eternity in thy content—(Naught but the greatest struggles, wrongs, defeats, could make thee greatest—less could make thee great.)

Thy lonely state—something that ever seeks and seeks, yet never gains!

Silly some right without—some voice, in huge monotonous rage of freedom-love some,

Some vast heart, like a planet's, chained and chafing in those breakers,

By lightning's swell and spasm, and panting breath,

And rhythmic rasping of thy sands and waves,

And urgent hiss, and savage peals of laughter,

And undertones of distant line rock (Sounding, appealing to the sky's deaf ear—but now, report for once,

A phantom in the night thy confidant for once),

The first and last confession of the globe,

Outsuring, muttering from thy soul's abysses,

The tale of cosmic elemental passion,

Thee tallest to a kindred soul.

—Harper's Monthly.

Rival Lovers.

"Cheerily, boys!" shouted the master.

"We must be nearing the coast. Hold hard the helm, Jean! Make fast the rope, Pierre!"

Over the raging sea the fishing smack shot like a flash. The previous day they had set out amid superb weather. There was a stiff breeze, covering with light foam the waves, upon the surface of which the sun was mirrored with bright silvery reflections. Nevertheless, on passing the lookout house Pierre Landure, the master, had paused with an uneasy air. In less than an hour the barometer, the column of mercury which glistered at the door, had fallen a centimetre. The old man had remained there a second, seeking to reflect. Then he had glanced at the sky, sniffed the wind, and had ended by shrugging his shoulders. A tempest in such weather, was that possible? He would have felt it, he who scented the gales a day in advance, and he did not scent anything at all, save a good catch of fish. The barometer was certainly wide of the mark.

"That was why Pierre Landure had set out with his two young men, Pierre and Jean."

Were they his sons? No. Pierre Lan-dure had only a daughter, Marie, the peer of the coast, a superb lass of 20, robust and delightful, with eyes of velvet and skin like a ripe peach. Pierre and Jean were mariners of the district, very resolute fellows, persistent workers, understanding their business, whom he had employed for a year past to go fishing on his boat. With them everything went splendidly. It was a question which of the twin had had most heart in his toil.

They were genuine rivals, forsooth! The master had his suspicions, as to what Belle-Ile lighthouse. Now they saw nothing save the horror of the darkness, heard nothing but the sinister howls of the wind as it tore its way through the cordage.

"Master," said Pierre, suddenly, "the watch-light is out!"

"Try to relight it below, and be careful of the fire," answered Pierre Landure.

"But, no," added he, taking a second thought; "I will do it myself."

And quitting the mast, to which he had been clinging, the aged sailor took two steps toward the hatchway. Just at that moment the sea swept the deck. A cry burst forth. The deck was empty.

"Malheur!" cried Pierre, "the master is overboard!"

"He is done for!" said Jean, still clinging to the tiller.

The two men leaned over the rail, searching the darkness with their dilated eyes. They saw nothing.

"Tonnerre!" resumed Pierre, "what will Marie say?"

"The chances are that she shall never know," replied Jean.

"Because we also will be drowned."

"Do you think so?"

"It looks like it."

"But we do not know."

"I know. At all events I have an idea."

"That if the smack should escape it should take only one of us back to land."

"Why?"

"Because of Marie."

"You are mad, Jean!"

"I am not. We are one too many, and you know it. The ocean is good. If you are not a coward we will profit by it."

"How?"

"Let one of us follow Pierre Landure."

"Which?"

"Let's leave that to Fate, to the first ship sighted. If it is to starboard, it's you. If it is to larboard, it's me. Will that work?"

"It will."

The two men were silent. A minute elapsed—so long as a century. The tempest seemed to have abated a trifle.

The waves came less swiftly. At last one of them swept the deck.

"Larboard!" cried Jean. "It's me!"

He stood nailed to his place, silent.
